The sound of a single slip being recorded against a wailing trumpet takes a sarcastic turn when a voice is heard saying: "My songs are hot, and I don't care what you say about them." These songs have been recorded here in the UK by Bobby Fraser and Chris Speed, "They say that the chicks in London are so fat, / I'm gonna hitch a ride to Aberdeen." I suspect it's the combined guitar and saxophone of Bobby Fraser, which makes this track such a great introduction to the overall album. Here's a link to some great reviews of this album. I think all the reviewers are in agreement that it's a very good album and is up there amongst the best of the band's output. This is the first time I've bought a free download, so I'm pleased with that. Q: Minimal number of matrices that can be matched with a bipartite graph Given a bipartite graph $G=(A, B; E)$, is there a theoretical guarantee on the minimal number of matrices that can be found to perfectly fit (match) G ? In other words, given the graph of a bipartite representation of a "target" system, what is the smallest number of matrices that are required to model the representation, to at least the same accuracy that the original system? Context: I'm working on a particular concrete system where the representation is as a graph and the matrices are by design 1×1 (and in fact, can be easily shown to be 1×1). It's reasonable to assume that I have a well-defined initial matrix that is typical for the system, e.g. a matrix for an audio recording system. I'm working in the context of having 20% or less noise in the system, and the target system is sufficiently complex (20 layers) that there's no hope of representing it accurately enough using fewer 3e33713323
