nuclei induces a spectrum of behavioral and autonomic reactions in the isolated perfused brain of the rat. The pontine nuclei contain a dense plexus of neurons that is involved in alertness, attention and motor control. This study demonstrates that electrical stimulation of the dorsolateral pons of the isolated, perfused brain of the rat evokes a series of behavioral and autonomic reactions. During stimulation at low frequencies (10-35 Hz), increases in brain temperature, heart rate and blood pressure are most pronounced. The temperature increase is associated with an increase in the ratio of slow waves and waves with higher frequency, indicating that the subarachnoid space under the isolated perfused brain is capable of producing temperature increase, via vasodilation. Both the heart rate and blood pressure increase are probably due to sympathetic outflow, since they are abolished by N(G)-nitro-L-arginine and mecamylamine (a nicotinic acetylcholine receptor antagonist). The vasodilation is associated with increases in both heart rate and blood pressure, indicating the presence of a potent vasodilatory substance in the subarachnoid space under the isolated perfused brain. At higher frequencies (50-100 Hz), effects similar to those observed during low frequency stimulation are observed, but these are more pronounced and a distinct periodicity is also apparent
