and consequently the whole, i.e., infarcted myocardial tissue. Myocardial perfusion-perfusion reserve will generally fall to half of the baseline value in the areas of the perfusion deficit. This may explain the abnormal coronary flow reserve and higher coronary vascular resistance during stress, which leads to ischemia. The perfusion deficit after 1 to 2 months reflects hypoperfused ischemic myocardium and is associated with resting and exercise dysfunction ([@b10-etm-0-0-7396]). Although there are some clinical evidences suggesting that CAG may be used to detect coronary artery stenosis in symptomatic patients ([@b11-etm-0-0-7396],[@b12-etm-0-0-7396]), ischemic burden can be quantified more objectively by perfusion imaging ([@b13-etm-0-0-7396]). Besides, coronary artery stenosis does not necessarily correspond to ischemic burden. In clinical studies, a reduction in IM and an increase in CFR can be observed in patients with coronary artery stenosis. The understanding of pathophysiology is essential to achieve a successful treatment. It was reported that 15% of the participants were suspected to have coronary artery stenosis in the case group, and the diagnosis was evaluated by CAG ([@b14-etm-0-0-7396]). If there were no significant stenosis, conventional therapy such as pharmacological therapy and revascularization surgery could be applied. Patients with significant stenosis were treated by drug therapy combined with revascularization. Some early-stage patients developed SD, and this is why they began to receive medical treatment. Early diagnosis and early treatment could reduce the incidence of SD and related complications. Changes in myocardial perfusion in CAD are well-known ([@b15-etm-0-0-7396]). The myocardium perfusion imaging was frequently used to monitor the effect of therapy, and was confirmed to have a higher sensitivity than CAG ([@b16-etm-0-0-7396]). However, some CAD patients need to be treated immediately in case of angina. Therefore, detection and treatment should be performed as early as possible. Studies have shown that PCI is currently the best choice for the revascularization of CAD ([@b17-etm-0-0-7396],[@b18-etm-0
