FIFA Ultimate Team in FIFA 22 introduces “The New Player Experience,” which improves Ultimate Team gameplay and allows players to experience “The New Way To Build” in Ultimate Team mode. In “The New Way To Build” mode, players build a squad from over 500 customizable kits from over a dozen leagues, countries and clubs to compete in a real-life game. Other features of FIFA 22 include the all-new “Soccer in Virtual Reality” mode, where players can experience real-life-like soccer matches in a totally immersive virtual reality environment. FIFA 22 will be available for PlayStation 4, Xbox One and PC on February 4th, 2017.

Q: Mocking a dependency in a service that uses the dependency I have a service that uses an interface. I want to mock out the dependencies of the service so I have separate mocks for the interface and the implementation. (In case I changed the implementation the mock would still work.) I cannot make any changes to the interface as this is a third party service. I am using Moq for the mock. I have also put a comment in the source code that may explain it better. Is this possible? The problem I have is when I mock the interface the mock of the implementation gets injected into the service. I assume this is because I have already setup the dependency (the mock) when creating the service. I.e. `public MyService(MyInterface myInterface){ //setup dependency this.myInterface = myInterface; } public void run(){ //run var myMock = new MyMockImplementation(myInterface); }` A: When you mock a class it's called a mock factory. If you are using Moq you can set up the mock factory and then use a mock of the class you are interested in. The exception you have are the ones you are not creating the mock factory on the service. The service should create the class then pass it into the constructor or use a dependency injection framework to get it. Since you cannot change the interface the best way you can test the class is to stub the interface. Moq has a feature that allows you to stub the interface but you can't mock it, you would have to create a class that would get

Q: How to automatically start a cron job every 6 hours I have a crontab file that runs every minute and at the end it says: To start it again automatically, see CRONTAB(5) and cron(8) How do I get rid of this and make the cron job run once a day at 9:00 AM? Thanks! A: Run the command touch /var/log/cron.log on the server and check if cron.log gets auto-created. If it does, then you only need to touch /var/log/cron.log to start it running. A: Instead of modifying the crontab file you could use the crontab -e command. If you open crontab -e you are presented with an editor window where you can modify the crontab file. You could easily modify the cron job to start at 9AM. The current minute entry within the crontab file is commented out, but it is un-commented by default. To fix this just add the following line:  sleep 15  will run every minute,  will run every hour,  will run every day at midnight,  will run every day at 9am. and you will end up with something like this: # example crontab entry # *****
