The Manchester attack has brought it back to the front pages. In fact, many people seem to be so shocked by the sheer audacity of the attack that they don't even realise the scale of it. Today we have a letter in the Sun tabloid newspaper (again sorry about that, but this is a real world example, so I can't be too choosy) claiming that the UK is a soft target as terrorists can use UK soil to act. The letter goes on to claim that British soldiers face thousands of such attacks every year and yet the government is doing nothing to stop them. The letter does not say if the soldiers are foreign nationals nor the number. I did check, and, according to the UK Ministry of Defence, there are approximately 4,250 British and EU soldiers serving around the world. The letter even claims that "if your home country is not compromised you should be able to take a few tips from the A*me" and "if your home country is not compromised then it is virtually impossible to prevent a cyber attack" This is a ludicrous argument and one we often see in the media and certainly from idiot politicians. The reality is that the UK has a range of techniques in place to prevent and investigate attacks of this nature. Whether you are the perpetrator, a journalist, a business or indeed anyone who uses the internet, we have measures in place to protect us. What makes cyber attacks harder to detect is that they are often in progress for days before they are detected. We can't even see what a zombie attack looks like, we just know when something happened
