Wi-Fi is a popular wireless communication standard used worldwide. In a typical Wi-Fi system, a Wi-Fi access point (AP) is a wireless access point that allows users to connect wirelessly to a wired network. Wi-Fi systems are commonly used to connect to wired networks for the purposes of, for example, downloading Internet content, accessing email, instant messaging, surfing the Internet, sending and receiving e-mail, watching online video, or performing work-related tasks. Wi-Fi access points are available from a variety of sources, including local and national broadband providers. In a typical Wi-Fi system, a wireless client device is able to detect other wireless devices in the area and establish communications therewith. In order for the wireless client device to detect other wireless devices in the area, the client device's radio transceiver is designed to specifically detect wireless devices operating in certain frequency ranges. The wireless devices in the area generate electromagnetic radio frequency (RF) waves that form a radio frequency communication channel. In order for a wireless client device to detect the wireless devices in the area and establish communications with such devices, the radio transceiver of the client device must be tuned to a particular frequency of an available RF band. Various technologies are available for the client device to tune the radio transceiver to a particular frequency.

For example, in order for the radio transceiver of a mobile telephone to detect the signals from a wireless device in the area, the radio transceiver is tuned to a particular frequency, such as, for example, 2400 MHz, in the 2.4 GHz RF band. A typical Wi-Fi AP broadcasts a wireless network using a technology known as “IEEE 802.11”, which is typically written as IEEE 802.11.
