This study examines the potential of the direct lytic (DL) immunization strategy for the generation of antigen-specific, non-H-2 restricted cytotoxic T lymphocytes (CTL) in mice. DL immunization is based on the induction of CTLs by plating test antigen onto splenocytes from previously immunized donors. The nature of the antigen-splenocyte association used for these protocols is critical to the type of CTL generated. These studies suggest that DL CTL generation requires a significantly longer association time than is necessary for CTL generation using other protocols (i.e., CTL precursor frequency or in vitro priming). The mechanism underlying CTL generation via the DL immunization strategy is also discussed./* * Copyright 2019 The
