Microglial growth cones from adult human brain. The microglial cell is a fundamental component of the nervous system. Its cells are endowed with morphological and functional traits that suggest the existence of interconnections between these cells and neurons. The purpose of this study is to test the possibility of establishing the existence of synapses between microglia and neurons in brain from human adults. The preparations studied were obtained from a region of the frontoparietal cortex, the temporal lobe. Microglial growth cones isolated from the subcortical white matter of this region were observed using electron microscopy. The growth cones were characterized by their large size, the presence of common synapses, and the abundance of synaptic vesicles. The observations suggest that the neurons are innervated by microglial cells via synapses. The presence
