What's new:

Reefs - Part III In Part II of this narrative I described how the hard oceanic crust, composed of almost pure Hydrogen and helium and not Titanium as in a mantle rock, made it feasible for some ocean floors to rise above the water. I also described a thermal ocean floor generated by the melting of oceanic plates, and I predicted that many of the deepest currents will terminate in a heated water column where the extent of boiling will increase with depth. While this phenomenon may at first be unexpected, the fact is that its presence is already being discovered by deep-sea explorers. In the ongoing coring of the Chagos Rise off the Atlantic coast of the southern Indian Ocean, liquids derived from prehistoric volcanic activity has been found in large quantities, and the result of the dissolution of slowly moving ancient mantle at a depth a few hundred kilometres below the surface has caused the creation of the so-called "Live Plate". The radioactivity in this material renders it "hot" and produces oxygen naturally in an aerobic state. Consequently, the scientists diving in this deep-sea area, "live in this "hot liquid world." The lamps they use are filled with this liquid and the fields of bubbles and cracks growing in the sea made it necessary to name this new phenomenon the "crack zone". The earthquake which produced this "crack zone" is a thousands of years old and is located in Madagascar and the western Indian Ocean. Historical source documents mention a large earthquake, whether real or a myth is hard to say but geologists agree that the "fault" has been active for several thousands of years. In other words, the same part of the sea floor in a certain period at a given place had found a new manner to communicate. During another expedition, Brian O'Reilly's team, discovered in the south of New Zealand, earthquakes in the upper ocean. The seismic source was located in the Andes Mountains in the southern part of the country, and the seismic waves were still capable of the crust the depth of 6.000 kilometres. Additional experiments to confirm this fact are still in progress in Australia. This prompted the team to investigate the occurrence of another type of energy release, electromagnetic, generated by the ocean's crust and submarine mantle that drags the sea floor at depths of more than two kilometres to a hitherto unknown depth. The boring of the grooves for recording the type of

The game is about infiltrating high-security vaults and cracking them by completing mini games. However, unlike other games which just give you a random number of rooms to go into, these vaults are highly guarded and the guards inside are very aware of their presence. You need to get to the end of each vault in as few moves as possible. The bigger the vault the more tricky it is and the more points there are to score. Each vault also has its own mini games. In each of the mini games you need to make it past the start and end points to win. In addition to the vaults there are over 50 levels to complete in all five continents. There are 3 difficulty types (1-3) depending on how quickly you need to clear each of the levels and the player needs to have some experience with turn based games, to play this game. Players are able to switch from stealth to fighting and back in any location at any point. So try to play in stealth and avoid the security cameras and the patrolling guards. If you did well then you will move on to the next vault and try to follow the same pattern. Try to proceed in as few moves as possible in order to survive. Features: ? Different Gadgets to use - ICD (Invisibility Cloaking Device) and the Handy Tranquilizer Gun ?Over 50 Levels and 5 Continents to infiltrate ?Different Difficulty types - 1-3 (depending on the number of moves it takes to clear the levels) ?Gadgets are used to aid you in your adventure ?Infiltrate a wide variety of the
