The Internet has provided a platform for malicious activity including electronic harassment (e.g., email spam), corporate espionage, and intrusions into secure systems. Thus, many companies have adopted security procedures that include strict rules regarding the use of electronic communication. To maintain security and prevent malicious activity, entities often implement processes that require a user to enter or submit sensitive data. This sensitive data may include a password, a pin number, or any other data that can be used to authenticate or otherwise prove the user's identity. A lost or stolen password, for example, may allow a malicious user to access a secure computer system. In some situations, rules regarding the usage of passwords may be relaxed to account for an existing breach, such as when a password database has been stolen or intercepted. However, despite these relaxed rules, a user may still be required to reset his or her password. Thus, the user may be prompted to enter the user's password multiple times, which may be cumbersome for the user. These repetitive prompts may also be inconvenient for network technicians or technicians responsible for troubleshooting or monitoring user activity. The present invention relates to a color image forming apparatus and a color image forming method of forming color images by repeatedly using developer of the same color. In a conventional color image forming apparatus, four image bearing members are disposed in the order of a primary-side photosensitive member, a primary-side intermediate transfer member, a secondary-side photosensitive
